Koalas are well-recognized and unique animals that are native to Australia. While the Australian government has not officially listed koalas as endangered species, Koalas population is decreasing. Koalas have a specific diet. They are herbivores, or plant-eaters, that survive almost on eucalyptus leaves. Koalas are nocturnal animals, in other words they are active at nights and sleep during the day.

Urbanization and deforestation are destroying the koalas' habitat and reducing their food supply. As gum trees are cut down for housing and development, koalas lose their source of food. Dogs, cars, swimming pools, pesticides and disease all threaten the survival of koalas.
